POLITICS

1 The Maya government was led by kings which were often considered divine or god-like figures in Maya society. Click each card to reveal facts about Maya politics.

The Maya civilization was composed of various city-states, each with its own group of rulers. These city-states were often in competition with one another, engaging in warfare and alliances.

The Maya believed in divine kingship, where their rulers were considered a connection between the gods and the people. Kings were believed to have supernatural powers and were responsible for maintaining order.

ENSLAVED PEOPLE

7 Enslaved individuals in Maya society faced immense challenges and lack of control over their lives. They were considered to be property, and worked long hours in farming, construction, and domestic duties. Their owners controlled their actions.

8 Living conditions were often rough, and they endured physical punishments and mistreatment. In the Maya society, slavery stripped individuals of their rights and freedoms. They were denied education, social mobility, and occupied the lowest level of the social hierarchy. Rather than being recognized as individuals with rights, they were treated as possessions.

KIMI

12 Kimi, the Mayan god of death, was the ruler of Xibalba, the Maya underworld. In Maya culture, when someone passed away, it wasn't the end, but a time of transformation. The Maya believed the dead only transformed into something new. Kimi was connected to rituals and ceremonies that were done to honor and remember the Mayan ancestors. These rituals were important because the Maya believed that their ancestors could still help and guide them. Therefore, the Maya saw death as a time of growth and change, where people could become something different and continue to watch over their loved ones.

GEOGRAPHY

13 The ancient Maya civilization lived in a vast area that included Mexico and parts of Central America. The Mayan people lived in different types of places, some of them lived in the mountains, where there were tall volcanoes. They grew crops like corn, beans, and squash in the fertile soil. Others lived in the rainforests, which were full of trees and animals. The rainforests gave them important things like wood and medicine plants.

14 There were also Maya cities near the flat lands and the coast. They had special places called cenotes, which were like big natural pools for water because it was hard to find on the surface. The Maya used the resources around them to build great cities and grow their civilization.
